

Notes in Two Columns

Before choosing a niche, decide what you can publish consistently for a whole year.

A clear audience beats a large one when you are starting out, so write for one reader.

Each post should carry one idea, and the headline should state the benefit plainly.

Review completion rate first, engagement second, and follower growth last.

One topic can be told three ways: as a personal story, as a checklist, or as mistakes to avoid.

Keep thumbnail text under six words so it can be read on a small phone screen.

The questions people repeat in the comments are the best source of your next topics.

Publish on a fixed schedule so that returning readers know when to come back.

Do not chase five trends at once; pick the one closest to your positioning and go deep.

Study why strong posts worked, and keep notes on weak posts as well; both are useful data.

Search traffic is steadier than feed traffic, so put the words people search for in the text.

The first three seconds of a video decide whether a viewer stays, so lead with the result.

A sponsorship rate should reflect audience size, engagement, and how focused the account is.

Community building works when you keep giving value instead of pushing products every day.

Set aside half a day each week to organise your material, and deadlines stop being a scramble.

Turn the openings and endings you use most into templates and save hours of repeated work.
